DOWN TO YOU

The use of fire rated downlights ensures that the ceiling remains an effective barrier to the spread of flame.

TODAY'S CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS HAVE TO COMPLY WITH REGULATIONS REGARDING FIRE RESISTANCE, THE FLOW OF AIR AND MOISTURE, ENERGY CONSERVATION AND ACOUSTICS. PETE HART OF AURORA LOOKS AT HOW FIRE RATED DOWNLIGHTS CAN HELP INSTALLERS COMPLY WITH THE LATEST BUILDING REGULATIONS.

Celling mounted recessed downlights are used extensively in residential, retail and commercial premises – but can installations using downlights meet the requirements of the latest Building Regulations? The answer is yes.

HOLE CUTTING

Recessed downlights are available in a wide range of designs incorporating various lamp types such as halogen, compact fluorescent (CFL) and LED. Although there are many lamp types, one common factor for all is that downlights require a hole to be cut in the ceiling.

Until recently, wherever recessed downlights were installed in homes and work places, holes were cut without much consideration to their impact on the ceiling, the void immediately above and the room above that. Now there is an increasing emphasis on safety, transmission of sound and the reduction of both CO2 emissions and energy bills. Building Regulations have been introduced to address these matters.

RESISTANCE TO FIRE

Part B of the Building Regulations ensures that the ceilings in a variety of residential properties and work

This new generation of downlights can be used in 30, 60 and 90 minute ceilings to help meet Part B requirements.
